Image One:

For this image, I went with a couple elements. The most important element was a chair which I then put in the middle of a field. This produces a scale where the chair is significantly smaller than the field which leads to an isolation feeling. This paired with it being in the middle draws the viewer to look straight at it. The trees in the background are smaller in order to maintain this scale contrast. I adjusted the lighting in order for the background to also have a darker feeling which demands a quiet and slow attention. What I believe is left unsolved is why is this chair here? Was someone sitting on it?

Image Two:

For this second image, I went for a tone that resembles chaos and requires an urgent attention. The elements all together have a relationship that can be described with high tension with very little balance as the scale of some of these elements create a hierarchy between them based on the size and color contrast I applied to some of them. The lines of the curtain help guide the viewers eyes downward onto the chaos. The red slash adds to that level of chaos as well. Something left as ambiguous is what happened here? Why are these elements all scattered, which can leave the viewer confused and left to interpret. This is different from the other images as they are calm but this one is chaotic.

Image Three:

For this last image, I went with a similar tone as the first image but the key element was far away. These are two elements that interact with each other at a very different level. It demands a slow and focused attention. The element is far away and the high doorway really attracts the viewer to look at them after some time. Leaves the question of why are we watching this individual from far away, what is the significance of them. The older black and white background also makes the viewer's eyes pop straight to the element being watched. The scale of how far away the element is really adds an element of tension yet calmness to the viewer since it is still a really big open space. The final touch of the yellow eyes adds to that level of mystery of "Who's watching"? The difference from the other two is where the other one is calm, this has tension and the second one has chaos.
